Some little prosperity yet however lingered in California. This, however, was confined to the settlements around Sutters establishment, and the villages, which, protected by foreign flags, had grown up around the Russian factories at Ross and Bodega, and the post of the Hudsons Bay Company. These factories were mere trading establishments, which were considered to confer no territorial rights, more than similar establishments do in the remote countries of the east. They were always considered as existing by permission, not by right. The only other portion of the history of California which need detain us until we come to the war with Mexico, was the occupation of the port of Monterey by Com. T. Ap C. Jones, of the U. S. navy, in 1842. This gentleman, then in command of the naval force of the United States in the Pacific, learned, while on the coast of Peru, that the British government had purchased from Gen. Santa Anna the whole of California, and that a fleet was then in rendezvous at the Sandwich Islands, under command of Admiral Lord George Paulet, to occupy the country. Under these circumstances, Com. Jones immediately seized the port of Monterey, to make any instructions which might have been sent the English admiral abortive. Whether the sale was effected or not, it was never carried into effect, and Monterey was returned to the Mexican authorities. There is little doubt that the American minister at Mexico was duped by the...
