Now in equation 1 let the increments diminish without limit, then  $d v v dp p$  from which we obtain by integration  $\log., l = C - \log.ep, tV = Op - 1$ , or  $v - y \times p$ . 3 From equation 2, when the increments diminish without limit,  $dp yl p$  and integrating, as before,  $\log.S.T = (1 - ) \log, p + C, r = Cp(1 - yl$ . 4 Those two equations, 3 and 4, represent, therefore, the relations between the pressure, volume, and temperature of gas undergoing expansion without loss or gain of heat from without. For steam  $y$  is 48 divided by 37 or 13, and equations 3 and 4 become  $p - l$ . 5 TOCp. 6 It must be remembered that these equations hold good only on the condition that the steam expands as a fixed gas, that is to say, without condensation, a condition which is complied with in rare cases only, as will be shown immediately. A diagram may be drawn from equation 5 by finding a few values of  $v$  by means of common logarithms, and setting off a few points on the curve as before. The curve produced is shown in Fig. 2, marked b, the one marked a being the hyperbola obtained from equation 1, page 13, and representing expansion by Boyle s law. The divergence of the two curves at first is very considerable, but as they recede from o they gradually converge again. They never meet, however, and the interval between them...
