This exhibits slightly undulate thin laminae, partly of thin flakes of clear mica, partly of a more dusty material. They are separated by a granular aggregate, doubtless crushed, in which occasionally clearer calcite crystals occur close to a larger fragment, formed either by its debris or under its lee. Cubes of pyrite, and products which result from its oxidation, are present. The rock is a schistose calcareous grit. 2(58, from the same moraine, a purplish-grey schistose rock, seemingly an impure limestone modified by pressure, bears considerable resemblance to the last both in the hand specimen and under the microscope, but is not quite so distinctly crushed, though a kind of foliation is perceptible. It appears to include a fair-sized fragment of a quartz-felspar grit. Apparently related to the last two specimens, but much finer grained, is 271, from the same moraine. Examination under the microscope shows the general character of the matrix to be the same, though the grains of quartz, etc., run smaller in size. Apparently these rocks have derived part of their materials from a crystalline series, but are not themselves, strictly speaking, crystalline. A somewhat similar rock (micaceous and pale green), from the same moraine, is 269. The powder shows fibrous crystalline aggregates enclosing felspar, in which often kaolin is developed, a fair amount of a carbonate (like dolomite), both...
