The purpose of the course in physics is to lead the student into an understanding of the physical phenomena continually taking place about him. The daily observation of the student is the base on which the course should be constructed. He already knows that most of the simple phenomena do occur, and it remains for him to learn why. The laboratory work should form an integral part of the course. Avoid spending too much time on measurements. Skill in manipulation will be acquired as the student progresses in his work on experiments that really have a physical value. No attempt is made to divide the course as to time for the various subjects. A few of the more important topics are indicated for each semester. The student should be led to observe the principles of physics that have been used in the everyday life about him. Trips should be taken to power plants, machine shops and other places that are of interest from a physical standpoint. References: Tower, Smith and Turton: Principles of Physics. Carhart and Chute: Physics with Applications. Jackson: Elementary Electricity and Magnetism. Barton:...
